What a discovery [illegible] is! A great story, brought beautifully and distinctively to life, this is the kind of film "great American indies" are supposed to be and almost never are, a fiction film made from fact—and from the heart. [illegible] is the story of real-life crop artist Stan Herd, who traveled from Kansas to New York City in 1994 to create a massive environmental artwork on land owned by Donald Trump. The multi-acre piece is made from soil, rock, plants and vegetation near an underground railway tunnel. Stan recruits a number of homeless individuals living in the tunnel as his crew. Over the months it takes to complete the earthwork, Stan deals with the difficulties of bringing his unique, rural art form to an urban canvas, and the many costs exacted upon his life. In an effort to show his unique perspective to a larger audience, Stan unexpectedly encounters the true meaning of his art and its ultimate, lasting rewards. A terrific, understated performance from John Hawkes as Stan—and the real artist's actual existing earthworks—are among the many highlights of this memorable new film, a treasure waiting to be found.
